Tel. Address:

ROSARIUM NURSERIES, CERES

TO OUR CUSTOMERS.

IN presenting our Catalogue, we avail ourselves of the opportunity to thank our numerous customers—old and new—for their kind support, and we express the hope that they will continue to favour us with their further orders. We have to offer this season a large stock of healthy, well-grown trees, suited to the various local conditions throughout South Africa. The cold winters, the dry, warm summers, and a fertile, sandy soil favour the production of Nursery stock, equal to the best in South Africa. Leading commercial varieties are in stock in quantities to meet large orders from commercial planters. Nevertheless, to save disappointment, booking at earliest convenience is advised.

We shall always gladly assist and advise clients, in matters concerning their orchards and in selecting of suitable varieties for their particular localities, especially in cases where no first-hand guidance is available.

We are practical Orchardists, and over 30 years of South African experience in Nursery and Orchard in various parts, is free at the disposal of our customers.

The Nurseries are regularly inspected by Government inspectors, and we hold a clean bill, with the privilege of introduction to Rhodesia and neighbouring territories.

Assuring you of our best attention at all times,

We are,

Yours very faithfully,

ROSARIUM NURSERIES

(ALFRED E. PAETZOLD).

ROSES.

A few words on their culture.

SHOULD it be found on arrival that the plants are not looking quite fresh owing to delay in transit, they should be immediately submerged in fresh, flowing water, or laid in a trench and covered to their full length with soil, well soaked and left to remain there for twenty-four to forty-eight hours, when they will have quite revived. All grafted roses should be planted deep enough to cover union of stock and graft two or three inches with soil. After pressing the ground firmly to the roots, a liberal supply of water must be given, and this must be continued in order to keep the soil really moist during hot, dry weather. In planting, roses should be pruned very severely—all the growth reduced to one or two shoots, and these cut back so as to leave only a few eyes above the ground, according to variety.

PRUNING.

PRUNING. Under the various and extreme local conditions under which roses are grown in South Africa the behaviour of individual varieties differs greatly, which makes it very difficult to give advice here on pruning which would hold good in all localities. In general it may be said that only the best of last season's wood of first growth should be chosen to build up and extend the plant, and all weak and unripe wood must be cut away and the remaining growths in the case of vigorous growers cut back to five or six eyes, in weaker growers two to three eyes. Noisette, Tea and other varieties of rampant growth have their long shoots reduced about one-half and all other wood very closely pruned. Hybrid Perpetuals have any long shoots best pegged down and the old wood reduced severely. The different types of Wichurianas and similar Ramblers must be constantly renewed from the base of the plants, as much as possible of last year's flowering wood cut away and the new growths shortened in. In some localities, some varieties of rather weak-growing Tea Roses, with very sparse pruning, will eventually grow into very large, fine bushes, grand objects in spring. Sweet Briars and other spring flowering varieties should be pruned severely after flowering.

SUMMER PRUNING is very important. It is a common belief that a young rose plant is materially assisted by not allowing any flowers to mature—by removing every bud at an early stage. This is very wide of the mark. Newly planted roses take, and they require, a short rest after their first growth is over, corresponding with a fresh rooting period; also to mature the young growth, which is very important. Removal of the young buds and picking off the spent flowers too soon will result in either giving the plant no rest at all or forcing it into fresh growth too soon, of which a weak, unthrifty plant will be the outcome. One bud on each shoot must be left to bloom, no matter how small the plants, and don't pick off the old flower until some of the eyes below it have run out about

2 to 3 inches, then have it off just above the strongest and most promising young shoot. Work on this principle for the whole season—also in any case where a plant is not making satisfactory headway—and a strong, well-balanced bush will result.

Sometimes from the old wood a very strong shoot is thrown up which will develop into a large bunch of very imperfect flowers. These shoots badly exhaust the whole plant and therefore are best suppressed when quite young; or otherwise take out the whole centre of this bunch of buds when still quite small, just allowing about five to develop into flowers. This will also convert an otherwise quite useless growth into ripe, thrifty wood.

Don't expect a few rose bushes to provide an inexhaustible supply of cut flowers. The very life is taken out of your plants by continually robbing them of their best growths, i.e., the long flower stems. Some varieties are very impatient to this treatment and a stunted, unthrifty plant is the result sooner or later. If you require quantities and constant supplies of cut flowers, have sufficient plants to give half of them a season's rest. Otherwise don't blame the Nurseryman for the failure.

Another frequent source of failure is growing of Annuals, etc., between the plants. Even under the best treatment roses resent this. The surface should be kept free of all growth, mulched and covered if possible with stable litter all the year round. In addition, about December and February, sow to each fair-sized plant a tablespoonful of a mixture composed of two parts superphosphate and one part of blood meal or Gov. guano, or bone meal and fowl droppings as an alternative on a more liberal basis. Avoid deep cultivation during the growing season.

PESTS, &c. Against green flies, syringe with soap water: 1lb. blue soap to 15 galls. of water with tobacco extract 1 to 100 added. Against leaf-eating insects, syringe with arsenate of lead, 2 oz. to 5 gallons. Mildew (the white powdery stuff on the young growths), dust with flower of sulphur on a warm day when foliage is dry. In moist localities, where black spot or rust are troublesome, syringe several times during the winter with Bordeaux Mixture or liver of sulphur, using a weaker solution during the growing season.

In placing orders with us, we presume that clients are acquainted with and agree to the following conditions of sale:

The Prices of this Catalogue are valid until cancelled, but we refuse to supply at erroneous prices through typographical errors, etc. Orders are booked at any time for execution during the proper season as far as possible in rotation, subject to being in stock at time of execution of order.

Prices and quotations are for goods free on rail Ceres, with a slight charge for packing material.

Risk in transit is borne entirely by the purchaser, which also applies to cases where we may have paid carriage to the station or siding of destination.

Cancellation of Orders.—Orders which have been definitely accepted by us, can only be cancelled, with our consent, up to 15th May. After that date it will be impossible for us to cancel or make any material change in previously accepted orders. We had once an item of 8,000 Apple trees—booked 8 months ahead—thrown on our hands late in the selling season, when we could have sold these trees over and over to other parties much earlier.

WARRANTY.—We use the greatest possible care in labelling, and we guarantee that every tree and plant we send out is true to name. Should it be proved that an error has occurred, we shall gladly rectify the matter by either refunding the invoiced value or replacing by the true variety. But, under no circumstances, will we recognise any further liability.

SUBSTITUTION.—Unless instructions are given to the contrary, we shall select the nearest and best variety in place of any sold out. A few extra names for a second choice are always advisable.

IMPORTANT.—All sales are subject to above terms and conditions, which conform with "Nurserymen's General Business Terms," adopted in all countries. This catalogue cancels all former quotations.
